Master Headstrong. 71

At length they came in sight of the Temple which the Fairy Cautious had mentioned; there were three avenues, at the end of all which the building appeared full in view. One of these paths appeared to be strewed with flowers; the second was level, broad, and even; but the middle way, narrow, rugged, and in many places looked as if it was full of thorns. Master Headstrong, who was by this time again got before his companions, chose the first of these, which b
